Current and Recent Research Projects

Trading risk: An internationally comparative study of reinsurance trading practices. This is a two-phase study commissioned by the Insurance Intellectual Capital Initiative (IICI) in partnership with the ESRC. Phase 1 compared the Lloyd's and Bermuda reinsurance trading markets, on the basis of face-to-face and electronic forms of communication. For over 300 years, Lloyd's of London has primarily relied on face-to-face interaction between reinsurance brokers and underwriters in the assessment and placement of reinsurance risks. Traditionally, great emphasis has been placed on these personal relationships as the basis for expert judgement on appraising risks. In newer reinsurance marketplaces, such as Bermuda, an alternative approach emerged that relies more on electronic communication between parties and the use of mathematical models to support underwriting decisions. Phase 1 was a 1-year ethnographic study to evaluate the implications of face-to-face, expert-based judgement and electronic scientifically modelled judgement for high-risk, high value commercial reinsurance placement decisions. The results are in an industry report: "Trading Risk: The value of relationships, models and face-to-face interaction in a global reinsurance market" www1.aston.ac.uk/about/news/releases/2010/september/reinsurance-trading.

For phase 2, the IICI and the research team extended the research focus to include Continental Europe. This extension supplemented the knowledge generated in the original study in three important ways: First, the inclusion of Europe produced a truly global dataset, covering the three main global reinsurance markets, accounting for 94% of the global reinsurance industry (Holborn, 2010). Second, collecting data in Europe not only allowed us to cover another marketplace, but also a different type of trading practice, namely disintermediated trading between cedent and reinsurer directly. The comparison of direct and mediated trading is an important addition to the comparison of electronic and face-to-face forms of mediated trading. Third, despite their geographic distance, the Lloyd's and Bermuda markets are both part of an Anglo-American cultural context. Studying reinsurance trading in continental Europe allowed us to uncover potential cultural influences on the perception and social construction of risk.

Aston Centre for Critical Infrastructure and Services (ACCIS). In March 2009, Aston University awarded funding to develop a new research centre, ACCIS (Amount £400,000). With Paula Jarzabkowski as the Centre Director, ACCIS is focused on developing Aston University into a centre of excellence for cutting edge research into the challenges of critical infrastructure service industries, which attracts funding for leading researchers and students, supports the practical needs of industry and impacts upon policy at the regional, national and international level. It will emphasize research that addresses current and future challenges for industries that provide the critical infrastructure services upon which regional and national stability and economic growth are based, such as energy, transport, water and telecoms. The Centre will deliver innovative research programmes that engage with industry, policy-makers and community groups in answering the big questions on 1) competition, regulation and their consequences at firm and market levels; 2) the implications of political, environmental and social inclusion agendas upon policy formation and implementation; and 3) sustainability and technological innovation in infrastructure industries. The Centre aims to grow into a key forum for exchanges of information and sharing of best practice between leading academics, industry leaders, policy-makers and consumer groups at the regional, national and international level.

Variation in regulated firms' responses to the state and the market. This project, conducted in 2007 and funded by the British Academy (Amount: £6,602), involved a cross-sectoral comparison based on case studies of firms in different parts of the regulated industry supply chain from the energy, rail, water and telecoms sectors. The study examines the implications of different organizational configurations and degrees of regulatory influence, for managerial responses to competing demands upon them from the market and the regulator. Findings demonstrate that a combination of compliance with regulation and manipulation of the regulatory environment to their market interests are the typical responses that regulated firms use to maintain some balance between the range of objectives that they are required to fulfill. Under organizational configurations of functional separation manipulation appears to be a stronger response, and also, counter-intuitively, under conditions of increased regulatory influence. The results indicate a need for longitudinal research into the patterns through which firms engage in different responses over time, according to specific contingencies of the institutional context, and their implications for meeting market and regulatory goals.

Conflicting regulatory and market objectives: A problem for strategy implementation. This project, funded by the Economic and Social Research Council of the UK, (Amount £139,302) extends existing strategy theory by examining the problem of implementing contradictory strategies inside organizations. Longitudinal qualitative data, including observation, interviews and documents, were collected over a 2-year period in 2006-07 in a Financial Times Stock Exchange (FTSE) 100 company undergoing a major regulatory shift to functional separation that exacerbated tensions between strategic actions targeted at fulfilling regulatory objectives and those directed at market objectives. Results show variation in the work practices and legitimating accounts that balance conflicting objectives, enabling strategy implementation, and those that polarize conflict and obstruct strategy implementation. I develop process models that explain how specific structural configurations, relative power, scale of organizational interdependence and importance accorded to market or regulatory objectives, lead to these different strategy implementation outcomes. The study explained implementation of contradictory regulatory and market goals in the context of functional separation but also raised questions about the strategic implications of different organizational configurations in response to state and market demands, indicating grounds for future research.

Strategic ambiguity as a resource in professional contexts. (with J. Sillince and D. Shaw). Professional contexts, such as universities, health care, arts and professional-service organizations, are prone to ambiguity and strategic goal conflict because of pluralistic tensions between their professional goals, public value and economic viability. This project examines how strategic ambiguity, which is ambiguous communication of strategic goals, can serve as a resource enabling managers and employees in professional contexts to reconcile or cope with pluralistic tensions. Results show that strategic ambiguity enables diverse groups to attribute their own interpretations to the strategic actions of the organization and so, to avoid direct conflict. However, professional contexts also entail diffuse power and normative controls, in which strategic ambiguity may result in temporary allegiance to symbolic actions whilst obscuring consistent, collective strategic action. This study thus raised questions about collective strategic action in more overtly commercial organizations with different power and control mechanisms, which has been the focus of my other research projects.

Strategic planning in the multinational: Distributed and fragmented (with J. Balogun). This project, conducted throughout 2004, funded by an internal grant from Aston University (Amount: £4,750), examined how strategic planning enables collective strategic action in multinationals, which have tensions between global integration and local autonomy. While strategic planning has been criticized for failing to deliver value to organizations, some authors propose that it enables strategic integration because it serves as a coordination, communication and control mechanism, and that this is why organizations continue to invest considerable time and resource in strategic planning. This study was conducted in a multinational implementing a new and contested strategic planning mechanism in order to develop strategic integration across Europe. Findings show that, despite struggles over local power and autonomy, differentiated social mechanisms and controls emerged as part of the planning process, which enabled negotiation between the different and sometimes conflicting interests of the corporate centre and powerful business divisions in important geographical markets. This study explained how strategic action is negotiated in the context of a conflicted central goal, but also motivated me to conduct research into the problem of strategic action in the context of contradictory goals.

The relevance debate: Strategic management theory as an applied science? (with M. Giulietti). In addition to my research on strategy in organizations, I have also developed a strand of research that addresses growing criticisms about the relevance of the business school to management practice. Despite increasing concerns about whether management education is being applied within the workplace, there is relatively little evidence about whether graduates use the tools, techniques and concepts taught as part of management education. This lack of evidence is a problem not only for business schools but also for those organizations and employees who have taken part in the drive to further higher education. I have published two theoretical papers on this problem and in July 2008 I gained an Economic and Social Research Council of the UK grant of £78,076 to conduct a survey that evaluates patterns and drivers in the adoption of management education by business school alumni.

Conferences

I am an active participant at the leading conferences in strategic management and organization theory for three reasons: 1. I run tracks, working groups, workshops or symposia in my field, strategy-as-practice, at many of these conferences; 2. I typically develop any journal paper through a couple of conference presentations to gain feedback and develop credibility for the work prior to journal submission; 3. Conferences are important for developing and maintaining research networks and collaboration.
